Melikoff the Carawas not particularly fond of: the General was rather forced on him by drawing-room opinion, to which an Emperor of Russia naturally taxs much more attacked.

Alexander softened, and generally improved with age, excepting that in one notable particular be remained a Sardanapalus to the last. Like the wiscest of kings he was the slave of women. But in his youth he was somewhat harsh, or, it would be juster to say, at times. The times in question were those following upon a too gay breakfast. The Cast liked champagne, and was apt to be authority. women. But in his youth he was somewhat harsh, or, it would be juster to say, at times. The times in question were those following upon a too gay breakfast. The Carr liked champagne, and was apt to be suiky when the effects of that treacherous wine were passing off. Once he must needs go and inspect a school rather too soon after breakfast. The ness. children and their parents were mustered to recei e him, but the Czar refused to be pleas-ant. He found fault with everything and acted altogether rather queerly. A terrible

There are three kinds of hair; banged hair, urchin whispered in an audable undertone to his mother: "The Czar's drunk." Alexander beard and was solered in an instant by the last bar-tender. the shock. But he could not control h s anger. "That child's sick," he said aloud, pointing to the boy, "let him be taken to a hospital, and after that to a madhouse." The young scapegrace was hurried out of the room, but nothing was done to him and naturally the CEAR was careful to make no inquiries after him. He was not the man to injure any one in cold blood. In old age—for he was old at fifty-he foreswore sack and lived rationally, if not ideally. His greatest pleasure was then to take long rambles on foot, unattended except by a single friend.
His health was not good and he tried all sorts

"Idalia," and that covered a multitude of "Ouida" is dead, having attained a wide measure of renown. Rigidly moral journalists and high-church curates with polished mathers and subjued risualistic tendencies must alike mourn the loss of their favorite piece de resistano. We wonder what she was like, - the graceful word-wielder, the weaver of honeyed sentences. Latest accounts described her as growing stout-dreadful thought! Loving luxury, dresting neatly, talking little, and fanning from the embers of a fruitiess grand- passion of her own the soft dreams of love and sarcastic moss about women of society with which she alternately flecked her pages—these are the salient touches of her latest pen-and-ink pourirsyal. Like most females of propounced literary character she was, we may supp se, plain of feature and indifferent to ordin ay feminine delicacies. Much abused as were her novels, they have obtained a world wide circulation, especially among the gilded youth of both sexes. Meretricious sentiment and false feeling, with an upparalle ed acquaintance with, and power to reproduce the most delicate as well as the most striking touches of the light and shade of Continental life and manners. -these form her specialities as a writer. While the one may, with her pruriency, repel the cultured taste and refined sentiment, the the cultured taste and refined sentiment, the other must ever invite the appreciation of the imaginative reader open to the charms of the sumpy romance or lightly-limmed legendary story. Among all her works our favorite is "Pascarel"—the gossipy, garrulous "Pascarel" Who cannot recal her graceful description in that volume of those little Italian towns, "half menastery, half fortress, scattered over hill and plain by sea and river, on terrel over bill and plain, by sea and river, on marsh and mountain," within the cloistered aisles of whose shadowed basilicas the artist grew to be a man, "making his dwelling in the heart of his birth-place, with the tender sadness of the olive hills stretching above and around?" With what delicacy of touch and fineness of fancy does she not pourtray in a few well-chosen words the history of that complete if somewhat dreamy life! And how markedly the contrast comes out between the quick distinction which she attained and that won by the artist's quiet life-labor; "His work lives after him. The little towns are all gray, and still, and stilcht now; the iris grows on the ramparts; the reeds wave in the moat; the shadows sleep in the deserted market-place; the great convents shelter half-a-dozen monks, and the dim majestic churches are damp and desolate, and have the scent of the sepulchre. But there above the altar his wife lives in the Madoumi, his child smiles in the argel, and the olive and wheat are fadeless on their grounds of gold and blue; and by the tomb in the crypt the sacristan will shade his lamp, and pausing, murmur with a sacred tenderness, "Here he sleeps!" " * * * She has gone from the scene of her word-

A Depraved Wretch.

It is sad to have the duty devolved upon un of continually chronicling some case of human wickedness, and it is with a sickening heart and a relaxed faith in human nature that we to-day refer to an instance of more than usual deprayity. A person by the name of Witzner—we regret that we cannot aid in burling the whole of the miscreant's name down to immortal infamy—has just applied at Washing-ton for letters patent on a device he calls the Denotating Stair Red. This is an arrangement by which the impingement of the human toe on the rod while in act of ascending stairs communicates with an electric bell placed at the head of the tenant's bed. In his application this Witzner person calmly states that his device is for the protection of houses against burgiars, but a little calm reflection will convince the most charitable that this is DARK BLUE DENIMS : merely a blind, and that the real design is to betray the approach of the late incoming head of the family, and deliver him over to the fierce and inappeasable wife of the period.

As it appears that this Witzner is a widower, it is highly probable that he is the intimidated agent of some secret womans rights society, and the said fact also proves that he must have at one time suffered the fate of all married men, and, therefore, was tully aware of the result of this terrible exercise of his ingenuity. It would interest the student of philosophy to analyze the mental Alexander was well-meaning and commonplace. To originate a bold and rovel policy lay not in him. When he came to the throre he did not feel equal to the task of composing an address to his own people, though he had but to speak from his own heart (which was a good one) and they would have been perfectly satisfied. So he let it be known that he wanted a written speech, and forthwith a number of Excellencies set their wits to work.

Gortschakoff's production pleased the Emperor best, and he rewarded the Prince in Oriental style, raising him st once to the post of Chancellor, or second ruler in the Empire. What cellor, or second ruler in the Empire. What cellor, or second ruler in the Empire. What style, raising him at once to the pest of Chancellor, or second ruler in the Empire. What was better be kept him there, partly for his worth, partly because he hated dismissing anybody. It was so unpleasant to see an old friend looking salky, and altogether too dreadful to meet his eye.

Such a man was sure to fall under the dominion of favorites; and it speaks well for the worth of character which underlay his feebleness of will that Alexander chose his condidential acquaintance well. Among the most intimate was Count Schouvaloff, whose patrictism and abilities it would be folly in Englishmen to deny. Schouvaloff was one of two or three who were allowed to dip into it entered to the pest of Chancello, and it seems and his stocking feet—instead, we say, of peacefully accomplishing this allways more or less hazardous feet, and then insidiously burrowing in beside the unexploded family torpedo, the miserable wretch touches off the infamous device alluded to, and is confronted at the head of the flight by a white-robed, tight-frizzed tornado armed with the wrath of righteonsness and a rolling pin. Is it possible this Witzner could imagine such scenes as this without pity, without relenting? But there is no use wasting speculations on a demon whom reflections such as these could not influence.
